

You've Heard of The Man In Black... But, are you ready for The Men In Black und White?

In music there are many trends. For years, everyone wanted to get that "Nashville Sound." Later, record companies hyped bands that had the "Seattle Sound." Well let's see if the world is ready for the new "Nappanee Sound." "Where's Nappanee?", you ask. Nappanee, Indiana is the heart of Amish country and it's the birthplace of three young Amish rock musicians who call themselves...

THE ELECTRIC AMISH

Their last CD was released in November, 1999 with the title "A Hard Day's Work". It includes instant hits such as "Hay Ride" and "All Right Cow". This came on the heels of their first two incredibly successful CDs that included classic hits like "Come Together (And Build A Barn)", "Black Bonnet Girls", "I Want To Hoe Your Land" and "Mennonite Blues." The three albums, "Barn To Be Wild", "Milkin' It" and "A Hard Day's Work" have sold over 80,000 copies. The band's songs have been #1 on the request line at WFBQ Radio and the band has played to a crowd of 30,000 fans as the headline act at a local music festival. With press from such notable publications as BILLBOARD magazine, U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT and PLAYBOY as well as making their national television debut on the short-lived Fox Television program, "What's So Funny?", the band quickly won national notoriety.

Born and raised in Nappanee, Indiana, the band is a "no power trio" featuring the talents of Carl Goodman, Barry Goodman and Graeber Goodman (no relation) and relying on the electrical power generated by local windmills. The guys met at a Barn Raising and, because of a mutual love of music, formed a Skiffle group. Later, upon learning that Skiffle had gone out of fashion nearly forty years earlier, the band turned to Rock and Roll.

So don't wait until The Electric Amish are playing only stadiums to catch these bearded wonders. Grab a CD, pop it in and crank it up...if you're not afraid of burning in Hell! Tune in, churn on and grow a beard.
